

Enabling active load management for next-generation demand response

Some utilities are embarking on the second phase of demand response. They are no longer looking at demand management as a passive sideline component of their business. Changes in consumption, the integration of renewables, and more sophisticated control technologies are introducing the opportunity for utilities to more actively manage demand.

